This applicant is average on an intellectual reasoning level.

This I.Q. test is a general assessment of your ability to think and reason. Your I.Q. score is actually an indication of how you compare in this ability with the majority of people in the work force. A score of 100 for example, means that, as compared to the majority of people in the workforce, you have normal intelligence.

Most psychologists consider those falling in the range of 85 to 103 as having a normal or average I.Q. Your actual I.Q. may vary 5 points either way from your test score.

In addition, there are many factors that may effect your scoring. If you are tired, stressed ill or distracted, your score will be affected. There are many abilities which are not measured by I.Q. testing.

For example, I.Q. does not measure artistic talent, manual dexterity or a variety of other abilities. I.Q. testing does give you an important indication of your ability to think, reason and solve problems.
